Worming correctly can save lives!

Worming horses today can be a real challenge. With all the different brands on the market, it's hard to decide which one is right for your horse. Improper worming can cause serious damage to your horse from digestive problems, colic, malnourishment and worse.

Paste wormer is the most commonly used method of worming horses. However, they are developed to target different parasites, and will need to be rotated with other wormers to be effective. Rotation also keeps your horse from building up immunities to one certain product. If you use the same product everytime, the parasites will become immune to it.

There are many different types of parasites that reside in our horse's environment.

Pinworms: Pinworm eggs are picked up by horses from contaminated feed, water, or bedding. These worms are irritating, causing the horse to rub its tail, resulting in hair loss and sometimes injury to the tail and rump.

Ascarids (large Roundworms):

The adult stages of the large roundworm is found in the small intestine, where the female passes large numbers of eggs into the manure. In about two weeks, these eggs become infective and the horse picks them up while grazing. The larvae migrate into the blood vessels and are carried to the liver and lungs. The immature worms are coughed up and swallowed, maturing in the small intestine to complete the life cycle.

Bots: Bots are the immature maggot stages in the life cycle of the bot fly. The females lay their eggs by attaching them to the hairs of the front legs, throat, and under line. As the horse licks itself, the larvae attach themselves to the lips and tongue and burrow into these tissues. After about three weeks they attach themselves to the lining of the stomach, where they may remain for several months, causing additional damage.

Large Strongyles (Blood Worms): Adult strongyles are found firmly attached to the walls of the large intestine, where the females pass large numbers of eggs into the manure. These eggs hatch and the larvae climb blades of grass and are swallowed. The larvae then migrate to the large arteries which supply the intestines. As the artery walls are damaged, blood clots form and break away, causing colic.

Tapeworms: Difficult to diagnose, it is estimated that 40% of the horses in the U.S. are affected. Tapeworms are contracted during grazing, when the horse ingests the intermediate host, a mite found on plants. Once infected, tapeworms contribute to digestive problems, colic and malnourishment. Tapeworms are often undetected using normal fecal flotation methods.

Always consult your vet to help you come up with a de-worming program suited specifically to your horse and the area in which you live.

A good schedule to follow when worming horses is to de-worm about every two months, year round. At least twice a year use a wormer that is effective against all worms and bots, such as Ivermectin.

There are two very important times of the year to use a bot wormer. The first is during early spring, before the larvae leave the horse's stomach. The second is in late fall.

We want the best performance out of our horses - so keep them safe, healthy and worm free!
