What to look for in a great penning horse?

A good horse is your greatest asset in being a successful team penner. It is somewhat of a task to try out "prospects" from the cutting or cow horse disciplines and be able to tell if the horse will be a good penner. It is usually beneficial to use the services of a professional penner to help make that decision.

Once you have "the horse", it is also important to practice. What practice will do is expose you and your horse to the many different scenarios of team penning.

CLINICIANS CORNER

Maintaining a great penning horse.

Clinics are also a great tool to help you to quickstart the learning process.

How much should you practice? It depends on each individual, but some sort of penning practice or cow work will really help you to know your horse and get him working to the best of his ability. I work my horses at least once a week, sometimes more on a new horse or a little less on a seasoned campaigner. What I like to do is use penning practice to fix any weaknesses my horse may have.

To me, it doesn't matter if I ride with my regular partners or not. I mostly work on me and my horse working as a team. I want to know where she is strong and where she needs my help. Some cow work exercises tailored to simulate team penning maneuvers is also an excellent way to get your horse really broke to perform consistently for you. I also like to experiment with different bits to find the one that my horse likes and works the best in.

My feeding program is very individualized so each horse gets exactly what he needs to maintain the energy level specific to that individual. Some need more energy to perform and some not so much so getting it right is a big part of my preparation.

All of the above will help you and your horse to be the best you can be.

Good luck and see you in the pen!
